“Women and the Movement: The Past, Present, and Future Roles of Women in the Search for Social Justice”

This forum examines how the personal and professional lives of women appear to define their commitment and dreams, passion and compassion, and work and action in creating socially just and equitable communities. This discussion is grounded in critical feminist postmodern theory, and places women's experiences at the center of analysis. The panel will explore formal and informal educational experiences in an effort to discover how these experiences have defined and influenced their work for social justice. How have the past and present life experiences of women influenced their navigating successfully and unsuccessfully across institutional, political, historical, economic and social arenas to create socially just and equitable communities? This intergenerational dialogue is open to the public.
